1.0 INTRODUCTION

Wood Environment and Infrastructure, a division of Wood Canada Limited (Wood), was contracted by Equinor Canada Ltd. (Equinor) to conduct seabed surveys at target locations in the Flemish Pass within Exploration Licence (EL) 1156. The objective of the survey was to identify any aggregations of coral and sponges at two potential wellsites and characterize the benthic fauna present within the surveyed area (Figure 1-1).

This pre-drilling underwater survey was conducted in consideration of conditions for release for the Flemish Pass Exploration drilling program that required "a survey to identify aggregations of habitat-forming corals or sponges at each well location and around each anchor point prior to commencing the drilling of a well" (Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency; CEA Agency 2019). The CEA Agency has defined an aggregation of habitat-forming corals or sponges as an "aggregation of coral or sponges that are known or observed to support fish" (CEA Agency 2019). The Canada-Newfoundland and Labrador Offshore Petroleum Board (C-NLOPB) further defines a coral aggregation (see below) and implement specific guidance to authorize drilling activities where cold-water coral colonies may be present. The guidance has been utilized to prevent physical damage to corals within the vicinity of drilling activities. This guidance indicates that drilling activities, shall not occur within 100 m of coral colonies, defined either as:

- Desmophyllum pertusum (synonymous with Lophelia pertusa) reef complex; or
- Five or more large corals (larger than 30 centimeters in height or width) within a 100 square metre area.

There is currently no guidance on drilling near sponges in the C-NLOPB guidance thus, the measurement threshold was implemented for sponges as well as a due diligence; however, it is unclear if there are any drilling activity restrictions or mitigations required.

The survey was designed and conducted, in consultation with Fisheries and Oceans Canada (DFO) and the C-NLOPB, to confirm the presence or absence of any aggregations of habitat-forming coral colonies as identified above, sponges, or any other environmentally sensitive features. The survey design included submission and subsequent approval of a seabed survey plan (Equinor Canada Ltd. 2021). The seabed survey plan considered potential coral and sponge species likely encountered offshore Newfoundland and Labrador, potential impacts from Project Activities including the drill cuttings modelling footprints, and available regulatory guidance. Since the completion of the survey program and this report, DFO has released updated recommendations for measures to protect corals and sponges (DFO 2021). The survey plan and execution were completed prior to the release of this guidance and therefore will not be applied to this specific program or report.

The following report describes the coral and sponge aggregations observed at two wellsite locations in EL1156 and 29 geotechnical sites, and a description of the benthic habitats and a risk assessment of wellsite Cambriol J-31.

2.0 METHODS

The survey took place within the Flemish Pass from July 3rd to August 13th, 2021, aboard the Horizon Enabler (Table 2-3). Sites were surveyed using still imagery acquired via an EchoSurveyor VI autonomous underwater vehicle (AUV). Fugro GeoSurveys Inc (Fugro) were responsible for the operation of the AUV, and overall quality assurance / quality control (QA/QC) of the data collected during the survey. Wood provided onboard marine biologists that were responsible for providing direction to the AUV operators and Equinor related to C-NLOPB guidance compliance and plan execution. This was to ensure the collection of appropriate images for identifying potential coral clusters and characterizing fish and fish habitat. Equinor was responsible for the chartering the vessel and overall shipboard safety during the survey. Daily update reports were sent to Equinor detailing project activities, any in-field survey modifications, and survey progress. The survey (and specifically the wellsite survey) was designed in consideration of operational activities at each site. Below is a description of the operational activities considered and AUV image survey design.

2.1 Drill Cutting Dispersion Model

Benthic habitat and invertebrates maybe effected by drill cuttings during normal operations and the survey was designed with this consideration. Studies on the effects of sedimentation and burial from drill cuttings on benthic invertebrates have found the effects to be mainly localized to the vicinity of the cuttings pile (Neff et al. 2000, Gates and Jones 2012). The predicted-no-effect threshold (PNET) for non-toxic sedimentation (based on benthic invertebrate species burial tolerances) is an average burial depth of 6.5 mm (Kjeilen-Eilertsen et al. 2004, Smit et al. 2006). However, burial tolerance can vary between species and a burial threshold of 1.5 mm has been suggested as a conservative threshold to assess drill cutting burials (Kjeilen-Eilertsen et al. 2004). Potential effects from sedimentation thresholds of 1.5 mm and 6.5 mm (combined WBM and SBM accumulations) were considered in the EIS (Equinor and ExxonMobil 2018) and are used in the risk assessment (Section 3.0).

As part of the Flemish Pass Exploration Drilling environmental assessment (developed prior to the survey), a drill cutting dispersion footprint model was produced for representative drill sites. The Southern Project Area (SPA) drill cuttings model, described in the joint Equinor-ExxonMobil EIS, was applied to the EL1156 potential wellsites (Equinor and ExxonMobil 2018). The SPA well site was chosen for comparison due to its similar depth range (model: 362 m water depth, potential wellsites: ~ 450 m). This model predicted the drill cutting deposition extent for cutting thicknesses exceeding 1.5 mm and 6.5 mm in the Flemish Pass (Table 2-1). The model predicted maximum dispersion distances for drill cutting deposition of 6.5 mm in thickness to occur within 1,000 m (shallow) of the drill center. The proposed sites for this survey were in water depths ranging between 450 to 500 m thus, the benthic surveys were extended to 1,000 m radius around the drill center for each proposed wellsite. Below is a brief description of the drill cutting dispersion model used for the survey design.

Drill cutting discharges can include spent water-based muds (WBM) and synthetic-based muds (SBM) and substrate particles ranging in grain size from fine clays to coarse sand. WBM tend to be larger in grain size and are released near the seabed in accordance with Offshore Waste Treatment Guidelines (NEB et al. 2010). SBM are finer in grain size and are released near the water surface. The SPA drill cuttings model includes the deposition distribution of both SBM and WBM discharges. To capture the seasonal variation in ocean currents experienced over the course of a year, modelling was conducted for four different 'scenarios' (for March, June, September, and December).

Across the four seasonal scenarios, the deposition and extent of the drill cuttings is predominately to the south-southwest (Figure 2-3). The average WBM cuttings deposited between 0.3 and 4.0 mm with 98.3 percent of discharged WBM cuttings settling within 1 km from the drill center (Statoil 2017). The maximum WBM cuttings thickness mainly occurred between 100 m to 1 km from the drill center ranging between 66 mm to 80 mm thick. Areas above the 1.5 mm PNET lie withing 700 m to 1300 m to the south-southwest from the wellhead. SBM cutting accumulations were low with the average thickness of less than 0.01 mm and a maximum thickness of 0.06 mm. SBMs are predicted to occur below PNET levels. Areas below the 1.5 mm PNET (combined WBM and SBM accumulations) are predicted to have no adverse effect to benthic fauna.

2.1 AUV Image Survey

Prior to the imagery survey, a hazards survey was conducted to identify any objects or terrain of operational concern using multi-beam echosounder (MBES), wideband synthetic aperture sonar (HiSAS). The hazards survey indicated the presence of ice scouring resulting in trenches several metres in depth and width. After the completion of the hazard identification survey, the final survey transect orientation were determined and the image survey commenced. Sites were resurveyed at a lower altitude (3 to 5 m above seafloor) to obtain still imagery. To ensure the safety of the vehicle, due to the irregular topography, the AUV was required to fly above 5 m occasionally. There were instances where the AUV's collision warning system was enacted, and the dive was aborted. Aborted transects were re-attempted depending on the complexity of the seafloor.

Overlapping Images were taken at a rate of five images per second with a downward looking Cathx color camera (with a resolution of 4096 x 3070 pixels) and laser profiler located in the center of the AUV. Overlapping images were necessary for measuring coral and sponges using photogrammetry techniques.

Geotechnical Site Surveys

Geotechnical sites were investigated for coral and sponge aggregations however, these sites were for the potential placement of a CPT probe that penetrates the seafloor. As a result of the small footprint of the CPT equipment (<10 m), the AUV transects were shorter and closer in spacing as compared to the wellsite surveys. A 20 m x 20 m area was surveyed for each geotechnical site (29 in all). Overlapping images were stitched into a mosaic for analysis purposes.

Wellsite Surveys

A 100-m radius was surveyed around each proposed drill centre for each of the two well sites (Cambriol J-31 and Cambriol East). The drill centre surveys were used to determine the presence of C-NLOPB defined coral complexes/clusters. Transects were spaced 20-m apart and surveyed with one AUV pass.

Once the drill centre 100-m radius boundary was surveyed and if deemed free of C-NLOPB defined complexes/clusters, a one-km radius centred on the drill centre was surveyed. Transects in the one-km radius were also spaced 20-m apart with one AUV pass. Additionally, anchors may be used at the Cambriol J-31 wellsite. The anchor pattern consisted of eight tapered anchor chain pathways extending 2,150 m emanating from the drill centre. Survey transects were spaced 20-m apart and surveyed with one AUV pass. The initial 1,200-m of chain pathway survey area from the drill center began with a width of 200-m and the extending, additional tapered 950-m survey area widened to 350-m. For all transects, orientation was determined in the field based on local bottom currents and seabed terrain identified from the hazard survey.

2.2 Data Analysis

The data analysis consisted of two parts, a regulatory assessment analysis (geotechnical sites and the two wellsites), and a habitat characterization analysis (Cambriol J-31 only). The habitat characterization results for Cambriol J-31 were then used in the coral and sponge risk assessment for the wellsite. Below is a brief description of each analysis.

2.2.1 Regulatory Assessment Analysis

To comply with the C-NLOPB coral guidance, all images with corals and sponges were screened in and measured using photogrammetry. Photogrammetry is a technique where physical objects are measured from a 3-dimensional point cloud that was generated from overlapping photographic images of the target object (Figure 2 2). Images were taken three to five meters above the seafloor with a downward looking Cathx color camera (with a resolution of 4096 x 3070 pixels) and a laser profiler located in the center of the AUV. Images were taken at a rate of 5 per second and georeferenced post survey. Each image was encoded with a time stamp and AUV position.

Still images with corals and sponges potentially greater than 20 cm in height or width were screened-in for point cloud generation and measurements. Screened-in images and the resulting point clouds were geo-tagged and measurements taken using the point cloud reading software Quick Terrain Reader (QT) v8.2.3 (Applied Imagery, Johns Hopkins University 2003). Figure 2-3 shows an example of a point cloud being reviewed in QT (Figure 2-3, A) and the original photo that was screened in (Figure 2-3, B). All measurements were mapped using the image's original coordinates. Clusters, defined as per the C-NLOPB guidance, were identified and mapped.

2.2.2 Habitat Characterization Analysis

A subset of the AUV imagery data was analyzed for habitat characterization and incorporated into the subsequent risk assessment. All transects sections within the 100-m radius around the drill center and within the drill cutting footprint were analyzed for substrate and fauna present. All other areas within the 1-km radius and anchor footprints, transects were identified for analysis every 100 m and within the selected transects, every other 50-m section was analyzed.

Habitat Characterization: Surficial Geology

The surficial geology for each transect section was described at the substrate class level and expressed as percentage of coverage. The particle size classes were based on the Wentworth-Udden particle scale (Kelly et al. 2009, Wentworth 1922) (Table 2-4).

Table 2-4 Substrate categories used to categorize benthic environment

Substrate Class	Substrate Type	Definition of particle size class
Bedrock		Continuous solid bedrock
Coarse	Boulder	Rocks greater than 250 mm
	Rubble	Rocks ranging from 130 mm to 250 mm
Medium	Cobble	Rocks ranging from 30 mm to 130 mm
	Gravel	Granule size or coarser, 2 mm to 30 mm
Fine	Sand	Fine deposits ranging from 0.06 mm to 2 mm
	Mud	Material encompassing both silt and clay <0.06 mm
Organic/Detritus		A soft material containing 85 percent or more organic materials
Shells		Calcareous remains of shellfish or invertebrates containing shells

Habitat Characterization: Macrofauna

Macrofauna species were identified by functional group or morphotype using available field guides (e.g., Scott and Scott 1988, Daigle et al. 2006, Beazley and Kenchington 2015, Kenchington et al. 2015). Due to the AUV angle of view and distance from bottom, sedentary and mobile fauna were enumerated where visible. Faunal densities are based on survey distance with an estimated width based on typical known field of view of 4 m width. The taxonomic level of identification was dependent on the quality of the imagery and prominence of identifying characteristics.

Identifying species of corals and sponges with imagery alone can be difficult as features that distinguish between some species can be internal features or require magnification. To identify to species level would potentially require examination by a qualified taxonomist of recovered specimens. Therefore, corals and sponges taxa were categorized into widely used functional /morphological groups that have been established and defined across several taxa identification guides (Best et al. 2010, Beazley et al. 2013, Kenchington et al. 2015). The taxonomic level of identification was dependent on the quality of the imagery and prominence of identifying characteristics. Corals were assigned into one of five functional groups based on size, shape, and other distinguishing characteristics (Table 2-5).

Soft corals (Alcyonacean and Nephtheids) are characterized by a lack of a hard structure and have a hydrostatic support system. Black-corals (Antipatharia) generally have a black hard skeleton. Stony corals (Scleractinia) can form either reefs/mounds or exist as individual cup corals. Branching corals/gorgonians form fan or bush like structures with hard skeletons. Sea pens (Pennatulaceans) are solitary corals that appear feathery or as long whips.

Six sponge morphological groups are based on general shapes that are present over several classes and families (Table 2-6). Thin-walled/foliose sponges come in a variety of shapes and sizes, but all have a thin wall. Fan-shaped sponges form flat fans in various sizes. Massive/globular sponges are thick without a distinct shape or form. Small/spherical sponges are more rounded than massive/globular sponges. Papillate/globular sponges have projections of various length coming from the top. Encrusting sponges consist of low-lying species that are usually found on hard substrates.

In-situ coral and sponge condition were recorded during the survey. Condition included if individuals were alive (Good), dead, or have visible damage to them (e.g., broken skeletons, polyps are missing, or pieces of the sponge body are missing) (Table 2-7). However, during the post-survey risk assessment coral and sponge condition were classified according to the NOROG guidelines (DNV 2013).

Table 2-7 Coral and sponge visual condition classifications with descriptions (modified from Liefmann et al. (2018) and Fang et al. (2018)).

Coral Condition		Sponge Condition
Condition	Description	Condition	Description
Good (G)	Coral is oriented upright with polyps extended and not visible sedimentation	Sediment veneer[1] Presence/absence	Surface of a sponge has a veneer of sedimentation.
Damaged (Dm)	A portion of the coral is covered with sediment and/or percentage of polyps are missing.	Covered (C)	The base of the sponge or a portion of the body is obscured by accumulated sediment
Dead (D)	Coral skeleton with no polyps
[1] Veneers from natural background sedimentation are commonly observed on sponges in the area. Condition categories for corals and sponges are based off visual observations and methods discussed in Liefmann et al. (2018) and Fang et al. (2018) respectively.

2.2.3 Other Observations

Any anthropogenic disturbance or debris present in the images (e.g., trawl marks, nets, debris) were also noted during the image analysis.

2.3 Mapping

The AUV transects were executed using coordinates captured from the high precision acoustic positioning (HiPAP) system aboard the offshore supply vessel the Horizon Enabler. These coordinates were used to geo-reference the AUV still imagery and all measurements were plotted using the GIS software ArcMap v10.5 (ESRI 2016). Clusters were identified using a 10-m grid. Surficial geology (largest substrate type present) and macrofauna densities per transect section were also mapped.

2.4 Coral and Sponge Risk Assessment

Changes to the environment following oil and gas activities may occur. Those changes may include smothering from drilling discharges and physical impact from installing subsea infrastructure. A risk assessment provides decision support with regards to project activities and inform a post-drilling monitoring program. Wellsite surveys were assessed following the C-NLOPB coral guidance and then using the NOROG coral risk matrix.

However, these assessment guidance's pertain only to specific corals or sizes. Fisheries and Oceans Canada (DFO) has requested additional habitat-forming species of interest be assessed in the information requests from Equinor's Flemish Pass Drilling EA (Statoil 2017, Equinor and EMCP 2018). These habitat-forming species of interest in the Flemish Pass area are:

- Cold water "ostur" (Geodia / Stryphnus / Stelleta sp. sponge grounds) – aggregations of solid or globular sponges commonly encountered above 1500 m depth.
- Glass sponge (Asconema spp.) communities – thin-walled sponges with large openings.

- Bamboo coral (Keratoisis spp.) communities – branched coral that can form dense thickets in large patches in the Flemish Pass.
- Sea pen fields – can be formed of multiple species and cover large areas. Individuals are typically small (<30 cm), though many species can be over a meter tall.
- Acanella arbuscula fields – a small branching bamboo coral species that lives on fine substrate that can form dense fields.

In line with previous recommendations from DFO, corals and sponges were identified to the functional/morphological group level. The C-NLOPB coral guidance does not include density threshold definitions for sponge grounds, communities, or coral fields. However, the NOROG guidance has density thresholds and was used in conjunction with the C-NLOPB guidance for this risk assessment. The coral and sponge communities of interest noted above correspond with the following sponge morphological and coral functional groups from Kenchington et al. (2015):

- Cold-water sponge grounds – solid/massive sponges
- Glass sponge communities – thin-walled/complex sponges
- Bamboo coral communities – branching corals
- Sea pen fields – sea pens
- Acanella arbuscula fields – branching corals

Below is a brief description of the coral and sponge risk assessment adapted from the NOROG guidelines (DNV 2013).

2.4.1 NOROG Coral Guidance

The NOROG guidance was developed to mitigate damage from oil and gas development activities to reef-building coral species and coral gardens for the Norwegian Continental Shelf. The NOROG guideline, in addition to considering reef building corals, was developed in consideration of coral garden species groups. These coral groups are also observed in the NL offshore. As stated in DNV (2013) coral garden species includes leather corals (Alcyonacea), gorgonians (Gorgonacea), sea pens (Pennatulacea), black corals (Antipatharia), hard corals (Scleractinia) and stony hydroids (lace or hydrocorals: Stylasteridae). Risk to coral and sponge taxa is assessed by a multi-step process that considers the probability of taxa encountering drill cuttings using the results from the site survey (taxa conditions) and the drill cutting distribution model predictions (deposition and extent).

2.4.1 Risk Matrix

The risk assessment is a multi-step process that first considers the density of coral and sponges in a given area (condition), the degree of exposure from drill cuttings, the consequence to corals and sponges encountering the exposure, and the probability of that exposure occurring. Taxa and drill cutting dispersions within the wellsite area are not uniformly distributed and each transect section will be assessed individually, however, the final risk assessment will be based on the entire wellsite survey area. Taxa condition is assessed per transect section based on the densities of corals or sponges present (Table 2-8). For corals there are four categories ranging from Poor to Excellent. For sponges there is only one category if the density threshold is met which is Aggregation.

Additionally, each transect section will also have a degree of exposure classification. The degree of exposure (accumulations) categories presented in Table 2-9, are based off the drill cutting dispersion model predictions for the survey area presented in Section 2.1.1 (Figure 2-1). There are four ranges for degree of exposure discussed in the EIS ranging from Negligible (below PNET) to Considerable (above 10 mm) (Equinor 2018). The taxa condition and degree of exposure for each transect are then combined into a consequence matrix to determine a consequence classification (Table 2-10). The consequence matrix has four classifications ranging from Minor to Severe. For example, a transection section with low coral densities (Poor condition) and low drill cutting accumulation (Negligible degree of exposure) would experience Minor consequences. The last step in the risk assessment process combines the consequence classification for each transect section and the probability of that scenario occurring. Probability ranges from Unlikely to Expected (Table 2-11). Probability combined with consequence result in a risk classification (Table 2-12). The risk classification is represented by colors with green considered 'low-risk', yellow 'moderate-risk', and red 'high-risk'.

3.0 RESULTS

Seabed surveys to determine the possible location of C-NLOPB defined coral complexes and other possible sensitive habitats (e.g., sponges) were conducted at 29 geotechnical sites and two potential wellsites. The 29 geotechnical sites were in four areas within the identified survey area (Figure 1-1).

3.1 Regulatory Assessment Analysis: Geotechnical Surveys

The geotechnical sites were selected for a cone penetrometer test (CPT) which uses a device with a small footprint (<5 m) on the seafloor. The 29 geotechnical sites were located in specific areas within the survey area (Figure 1-1). A total of 67 corals and four sponges were above the 30 cm height threshold and 292 corals and 23 sponges were below the threshold. Coral complexes/clusters were identified at three of the 29 geotechnical sites that were surveyed with the AUV. Coral complexes/clusters were observed at CP 2 and CP 4 and CP 21 (Table 3-1). In all instances of a cluster presence, the CPT centre was moved several metres to ensure there was no impact to the C-NLOPB defined coral complexes/clusters. There were no clusters of sponges identified at any of the geotechnical sites. Coral functional groups measured included sea pens, branching corals, and soft corals (Figure 3-1). Sponge morphological groups measured included, thin-walled/foliose, fan/vase shaped, round with projections, stalked, and massive sponges (Figure 3-1).

3.2 Regulatory Assessment Analysis: Wellsite Surveys

Each wellsite survey was conducted within a 1-km radius around each proposed drill center (in accordance with drill cutting model predictions). Survey coverage within a 100-m radius around the proposed drill center was used to identify possible C-NLOPB defined coral complexes/clusters as well as possible sponge clusters. If a coral complex/cluster was identified, mitigations were implemented in the field and the drill center was moved to avoid them (i.e., movement of the proposed drill centre such that field-identified coral complexes were outside the required 100 m boundary for drilling). The survey was recentered on the new in-field centre and additional transects were added, as necessary to provide similar survey coverage as the initial proposed drill centre. Below is the infield determination summary for each final drill centre location.

[1] Wellsite was moved to reflect identification of corals/sponges within guidelines, these values represent final wellsite location. Additional transects were added to the survey to complete the 1-km survey using the final in-field drill centre coordinates.

3.2.1 Cambriol J-31

There were no Desmophyllum pertusum reef complexes observed in either the 100-m radius or 1-km radius of the final drill centre location. A cluster was identified within the initial 100-m radius of the proposed drill centre and infield mitigations were implemented (i.e., drill centre was moved several metres to the northwest). No further clusters were identified at the revised site within the new 100-m radius. Once the new recentered drill location was confirmed, eight additional transects were added to the survey design to complete the full 1-km radius survey area.

A total of 74 corals were measured within the 100-m radius of which 21 were above the height threshold and 6 sponges were measured of which 2 were above threshold (Table 3-2). Within the 1-km radius a total of 14,814 corals were measured of which 6,805 were over threshold and 293 clusters were identified (Table 3-2, Figure 3-4, Figure 3-5). Soft corals were the most observed coral functional group; however, several sea pens, and an individual black coral were also observed (Figure 3-2). All clusters consisted of soft corals. Of the 1,083 sponges measured, 226 were above the threshold but no clusters were identified (Figure 3-6). Figure 3-3 includes representative photos of the sponge morphological groups most commonly observed and measured.

The Cambriol J-31 survey also included an anchor pattern that extended beyond the 1-km radius. There were no Desmophyllum pertusum reef complexes observed in any of the anchor footprints. Within the footprints (beyond the 1-km radius), a total of 11,490 corals were measured of which 7,803 were over threshold and 444 complexes/clusters were identified (Table 3-2). Soft corals were the most observed and measured coral functional group; however, several sea pens and an individual gorgonian (small) were also observed (Figure 3-2). Clusters were mainly composed of soft corals. Of the 729 sponges measured, 240 were above the threshold and no sponge clusters were identified.

3.2.2 Cambriol East

There were no Desmophyllum pertusum reef complexes observed in either the 100-m radius or 1-km radius of the final drill centre location at the Cambriol East location. These results occurred at the initial proposed drill centre 100-m radius and therefore no infield mitigations (e.g., drill centre move) were required or implemented.

A total of 85 corals were measured within the 100-m radius of which 34 were above the threshold and 14 sponges were measured of which 4 were above threshold (Table 3 2). Within the 1-km radius a total of 6,130 corals were measured of which 1,518 were over threshold and 13 clusters were identified (Table 3 2, Figure 3-9, Figure 3-10). Soft corals were the most observed and measured coral functional group; however, some sea pens, black coral, and branching corals were also identified and measured (Figure 3-7). Of the 1,295 sponges measured, 245 were above the threshold and no clusters were identified (Figure 3-6). Figure 3-8 contains representative photos of the sponge morphological groups most observed and measured.

3.3 Habitat Characterization: Wellsite Survey Cambriol J-31

The benthic habitat within 1-km radius around each proposed drill center and anchor pattern at Cambriol J-31 were characterized (in accordance with drill cutting model predictions). This included primary and secondary substrate types and macrofaunal groups. Below is a summary for the final drill centre location at Cambriol J-31. Individual functional/morphological group maps are presented in Appendix A.

3.3.1 Cambriol J-31

The benthic habitat at Cambriol J-31 was influenced by the complex benthic terrain. The area was heavily scoured from subsequent iceberg activity. In addition to the scour marks, the surficial geology consisted primarily of fine substrates (e.g., sand and mud) with sporadic coarse substrates (e.g., boulders). Percent coverage of coarse substrates ranged between 5 to 20 percent (Figure 3-11). Soft corals, (primarily Nephtheids) occurred in the highest densities (0.005 to 0.833 ind./m^2) of all the coral functional groups present (Table 3-3, Figure 6-1). Transects with higher densities mainly occurred to the southwest of the drill center. Other coral functional groups present included sea pens (0.004 to 0.070 ind./m^2), as well as an individual small gorgonian/ branching coral and an individual black coral. The highest sea pen densities mainly occurred to the north of the drill centre. The lone gorgonian (small) occurred within the anchor footprint outside of the 1-km radius to the southeast of the drill center, and the lone black coral occurred to the northeast of the drill centre within the 1-km radius. Coral condition for all corals counted were also assessed (Table 2-7). A total of 98 % of soft corals were considered in Good condition, and 99 % of sea pens. The solitary small gorgonian, and black coral were also considered in Good condition. As observed in previous surveys in the area (Equinor 2020), there were several sponge morphological groups present at Cambriol J-31. Sponges were observed throughout the survey area (Figure 3-13). Solid/Massive sponges were the most abundant sponge morphological group observed within the study area followed by papillate/globular and fan/vase shaped sponges. Sponge condition was assessed for all sponges counted. Of the sponges observed, a sediment veneer was absent on 57 % and present on 43 %. Solid/Massive sponges were more likely to have veneer present while, papillate/globular were less likely to have a veneer. Several fish species were also observed including red fish and wolffish (Figure 3-16). For fish functional groups, benthivores were the most abundant followed by plank-piscivores and piscivores (Table 3-3). Several invertebrate groups were also observed with anemones being the most commonly observed. Other invertebrates include snails, crabs, and basket stars (Figure 3-17). See Appendix A for specific macrofauna group maps. Hazards encountered included ropes, trash, and other debris.

3.4 NOROG-Based Risk Assessment: Cambriol J-31

The following section discusses the results from the NOROG-based risk assessment described in Section 2.4. Coral and sponge condition per transect were classified as per Table 2-8. As stated in the EIS, a PNET of 1.5 mm is considered a conservative threshold to assess drill cutting accumulation effects for corals and sponges in EL1156 and the model was binned as per the categories in Table 2-9. Actual bottom currents at the drill site at the time of drilling may differ from modelled results and the extent of drill cutting accumulation distributions may vary, so an overall probability of Likely is used for this assessment (

Table 2-11). Fauna observed in areas predicted to experience Negligible degree of exposure (sediment accumulations below 1.5 mm PNET) may provide areas of recruits for the eventual recovery and colonization of drill cutting sediments (Bakke et al. 2013, Kenchington et al. 2019). Functional/morphological groups with the highest relative abundance are presented below, all other groups are presented in Appendix B.

3.4.1 Cambriol J-31

Corals

Four coral functional groups were observed and assessed at this site. Coral functional group assessments, in order of increasing abundance

- Gorgonians (G) and black corals (BC) were observed in relatively low numbers (one individual for each) and thus are considered to be in the Poor condition category (Figure 6-21, Figure 6-22), both coral functional groups occur in areas with a Negligible degree of exposure and are considered to have a Minor consequence classification (Table 2-10) and are expected to be at Minor risk from drilling accumulations (Table 3-6).

- Sea pen (SP) densities were within the Poor condition category range (<0.2 ind./m^2) for all transects assessed. While sea pens are observed in various drill cutting accumulation categories (Negligible to Considerable), the consequence classification for a Poor taxa condition in any degree of exposure is considered Minor, thus with a probability of Likely, sea pens as a whole are considered to be at Minor risk.
- Soft corals (SC) occurred in the highest densities however approximately 76% of transects were classified as Poor followed by Fair (19%), Good (4%), and Excellent (<1%). With approximately 76% of transects classified as Poor, this condition classification was applied to soft corals as a whole and thus as described above, are expected to be at Minor risk (Table 3-6).

Sponges

The NOROG guidelines were developed for corals however OSPAR (2010) has classified deep-sea sponge aggregations as any density greater than 0.5 m^2. For this assessment, a binary classification of No Aggregation and Aggregation were used and treated similar to the coral condition categories Poor and Excellent, respectively. Below the condition maps for solid/massive, fan/vase shaped, and thin-walled/complex sponges are presented in this section while all other morphologies are presented in Appendix B. These sponge morphological groups have been identified of particular interest. For solid/massive sponges (SM), less than 1% of transects were considered Aggregations and thus the No Aggregation category was applied (Figure 3-21). Solid/massive sponges are considered to be at Minor risk (Table 3-6). Similarly, all other sponge morphological group were categorized as No Aggregation condition (Figure 3-22, Figure 3-23, Figure 6-23, Figure 6-24, Figure 6-25) and thus at Minor risk from drill accumulations.

Table 3-4 Condition categories percent transects per functional group (adapted from DNV 2013).

4.0 SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

The C-NLOPB coral guidance and an adapted NOROG coral risk matrix were used to assess the potential risk from drilling activities to coral functional groups of interest at Cambriol J-31 within EL 1156. Additionally, NOROG coral risk matrix was adapted to include sponge morphological groups of interest. No Desmophyllum pertusum reef-complexes were at either wellsite or the 29 geotechnical sites. There were no C-NLOPB defined coral clusters within 100-m radius from the re-positioned drill center at Cambriol J-31. There were no C-NLOPB defined coral clusters within 100-m radius from the drill center at Cambriol East. Geotechnical penetration sites were moved to mitigate potential harm to coral clusters. Risk to coral functional groups and sponge morphological groups at Cambriol J-31 were also assessed with the NOROG coral risk matrix. Based on the condition classification for all groups assessed (Poor) and the overall consequences (Minor), all coral functional groups and sponge morphological groups were considered to be at low risk to impacts. Additionally, no bamboo coral communities, sea pen fields, or Acanella arbuscula fields were observed in the survey area. Only one Acanella arbuscula was observed within the study area. The cold-water sponges of interest (Geodia / Stryphnus / Stelleta sp. sponge grounds, and glass sponges (thin-walled/complex)) were observed but not in densities considered aggregations.

Based upon the group densities observed, the potential risk to the local populations from drilling activities is low and would not lead to an ecologically significant impact.

5.0 CLOSURE

This determination report of the C-NLOPB coral guidance implemented at EL 1156 has been prepared for the exclusive use of Equinor Canada Ltd. The project was conducted using standard practices by qualified Wood staff and in accordance with verbal and written requests from the client.
